The Major League Baseball season kicked off in grand fashion this past Sunday, and already the campus seems to have gathered into its collective baseball camp. Even though the season has barely gotten underway, the air crackles with animosity and intensity. Polite conversations turn tense and heated at the mere mention of the ongoing rivalry that grips the varied fans at the Cross. I believe the rivalry is a classification of the varied fans that this campus boasts while running the risk of being lynched.

Yankee Fans: Every other blue-collar fan in America has long lusted the aristocracy of baseball fans for quite some time now. No matter what happens during the season, the Yankees always seem to finish at the top of the standings. And yet, every year they regress just a bit, and every year they lose the magic of the past. The problem with the Yankees is that they always seem to field a great team, due in part to a very successful farm system and some key acquisitions. For example, the team inked Michigan’s star quarterback Drew Henson to a long term deal, causing the football virtuoso to stiff a chance to be the #1 pick in the NFL draft. If he does well, he will be the first football player drafted in the past 10 years. The bench strength of a club like the Yankees is as strong as it’s ever been. The Yankees have a few less starts and yet they are about as good as any team in baseball. The problem with this team is that they have too much talent and too few weaknesses. This is a team that has thee aspect of its game and yet they lose.
