Marked an excellent time in the American economy, this year is less certain, a fact that may be reflected as new graduates search for work. In fact, according to the available data, the Career Planning office knows that 70.7 percent of the class of 2000 is employed. They also know that 28 percent is either in graduate school or involved in volunteer activity. That means that of the 68.5 percent of the class that replied, 98.7 percent became occupied after graduation, although the office has no idea how much of this is due to campus recruiting.

On-campus recruiting sees its busiest peaks during October, February, and March, the months students are on campus for the longest period of time. While the fall effort centers primarily around introducing the investment banking, the first industries to hire, come spring non-
