Elizabeth Johns discusses Winslow Homer in art

Early in his career, Homer was seen as an observer of nature, and now he was becoming a part of it. Painted in 1909, “Right and Left” is a classic example of Homer’s life being channeled symbolically into his art. The painting depicts two ducks, one just having been shot and about to die, and one about to be shot. These ducks represent Homer and his mother. The work reveals that he continued to cope with the loss of her even as he approached his own death. Through examples such as these and others, Johns gave a new perspective on the Winslow Homer painting I am studying in my Art History Class. These students and others interviewed shared a great appreciation for Elizabeth Johns’ unique approach to the life and career of Winslow Homer. By using psychologists, a student can better understand the ways in which art can be a testament to an artist’s life, feelings, and beliefs. Johns’ lecture provided a great deal of insight into the Nature of Observation and shed new light on Homer.

items of the night, especially the 13 TV which was anchored off last week.

On Saturday morning, family members were offered the opportunity to meet members of the faculty, and even participate in sample classes. Attendance at the classes was high, and parents were eager to participate in discussions and ask questions of their sons’ and daughters’ instructors. The main event of the day, however, was the afternoon brunch, which began to their way away from the College, but many guests who watched women’s rugby win over Connecticut Col- lege and the women’s soccer team’s game against American University. Family Weekend concluded with the induction of Yuna Kim, artist of the National Society of Collegiate Scholars, and the induction of the Alpha Sigma Nu National Jesuit Honor Society.

Students and families alike enjoyed the weekend. Several parents commented how much they appreciated an opportunity to see what life was like for their son or daughter, and how much more they liked the school after participating in the weekend’s events. Eddie Evans ’05 commented that “it was really nice,” andEdgar Jones ’05 found down by a tree near the Hill concluded the evening with a patriotic presentation of Proud to be an American.
